This historic book may have numerous typos and missing text. Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1896 edition. Excerpt: ... CHAPTER IV. SUGGESTIONS FEOM UNCONSCIOUS STIMULI. HALLUCINATIONS. If we may rely on our earlier conclusions, the relation of the two consciousnesses to each other during the performance of suggested acts becomes simple. We have seen that when an action is ordered the somnambulistic consciousness which received and understood the suggestion contents itself with introducing the idea of the action afterward to the principal consciousness, or rather it substitutes itself for the principal consciousness in order to realize the suggestion; but by certain devices very complicated situations may be created that involve corresponding complexities in the relationship of the two consciousnesses. The somnambulistic ego may be forced to co-operate with the normal ego in such a way that the suggestion becomes an act common to them. To understand this point clearly, it should be noticed at the outset that in many cases suggestion sets a problem. It indicates to the subject an end to be attained without showing him the means of attaining it. The way to do it is not part of the suggested idea, but is left to his initiative. Thus the subject is told to make a certain movement eight minutes after waking, but he is not told how to estimate the time to avoid making it too soon or too late. So, also, he is told that he must no longer see an object without instructing him as to the means he should employ to accomplish that result. So, again, a hallucinatory image is suggested to him on a blank card. He is told to pick out that one from among ten similar cards, and no process is suggested to him to guide him in his search. These are three typical examples. They are, moreover, the only ones of which I can now speak. They have this fact in common--that the end is...
