Not illustrated. 1839 edition. Excerpt: ...will leape from lip to lip, 20 Over liver, lights, and heart; Yet not stay in any part. And, if chance his arrow misses,-i_.i He will shoot himselfe in kisses. He doth beare a golden bow, 25 And a quiver hanging low, Full of arrowes, which outbrave Dians shafts; where, if he have Any head more sharpe than other, With that first he strikes his mother. 30 Still the fairest are his fuell, When his daies are to be cruell; Lovers hearts are all his food, And his baths their warmest bloud: Nought but wounds his hand doth season, 35 And he hates none like to Keason. Trust him not: his words, though sweet, Seldome with his heart doe meet: All his practice is deceit; Everie gift is but a bait: 40 Not a kisse but poyson beares; And most treasons in his teares. Idle minutes are his raigne; Then the straggler makes his gaine, By presenting maids with toyes 45 And would have yee thinke hem joyes; Tis the ambition of the elfe To have all childish as himselfe. If by these yee please to know him, Beauties, be not nice, but show him. 50 Though yee had a will to hide him, Now, we hope, yeele not abide him, Since yee heare this falsers play, And that he is Venus run-away. xvi. Bing of frames The story of this ballad seems to be taken from an incident in the domestic history of Charles the Bald, king of France. His daughter Judith was betrothed to Ethel-wulph king of England: but before the marriage was consummated, Etbelwulph died, and she returned to France: whence she was carried off by Baldwyn, Forester of Flanders; who, after many crosses and difficulties, at length obtained the kings consent to their marriage, and was made Earl of Flanders. This happened about A.d. 863.--See Rapin,
