Not illustrated. 1885 edition. Excerpt: ... Nematua ambiguus, Thoms., Opus., 624, 22; Hym. Sc., i, 109, 33; Andre, Species, i, 148; Cat., 26, 211. Head much narrower than the thorax, shining, punctured, the face below the antennae whitish-testaceous. Antenna bare, black, thin, decreasing very perceptibly in thickness towards the apex, the third joint apparently longer than the fourth; in length the antennae are longer than half the body, if not longer than the abdomen. Thorax black, shining, mesonotum very finely punctured, half shining, pronotum pale testaceous; the cenchri are scarcely visible. Legs white with a testaceous tinge, the femora with a broad black line on the upper side, beneath with a black or fuscous line; posterior tarsi and apex of tibiae dark fuscous, almost black, the base of the tarsi being paler, posterior tarsi equal to, if not longer than, the tibiae. Wings scarcely hyaline, having a fuscous tinge, especially at the apex, the costa and stigma testaceous; the first transverse cubital nervure very faint; second recurrent received slightly in front of the second transverse cubital; the second cubital cellule has a horny point in the centre; the third is small, nearly square. Abdomen black, broader at the base than the thorax, the apex bluntly pointed and pilose; the saw scarcely projects, the external part surrounding it is testaceous, and the posterior part of the ventral surface is of the same colour. The (J is smaller, and the antennae are thicker, the orbits are broadly marked with testaceous, and there is a broad testaceous splash on the pleurae; the anal segment above and the posterior half of the ventral surface are of the same colour. Also the posterior tibiae have more than the apical half black; the antennae are
