Excerpt from Ancient Leaves: Or Translations and Paraphrases From Poets of Greece and Rome

Ajax. Of Ajax, where he holds the outmost post, This while past have I seen thee trace and mark His new-imprinted footsteps, to discover Whether the hero be within or no: Thy steps are sure as scent of Spartan hound; It was but now he went within, his face Reeking with sweat and his hands red with blood. So, come, thou needst not peer within the gate, But freely speak thine errand out, and one, Who knoweth all, will speed thee on thy way.

Ulys. Dearest Athene, though unseen the while, Yet well known is that voice, as loud and clear As the deep note of a Tyrrhenian bell. Thou seest me on the traces of a foe, Ajax, the bearer of the seven-fold shield. For but this night past he hath done a deed Most passing strange - if that the deed be his; For herein we are all at fault, and I Have set myself to find this riddle out.
